KEEP IT SIMPLE
MAKE IT FAST!

AN APPROACH TO UNDERGROUND MUSIC SCENES

VOLUME 1

PAULA GUERRA AND
TÂNIA MOREIRA
(EDITORS)
Keep it Simple, Make it Fast! An approach to underground music scenes

Volume 1

Paula Guerra and Tânia Moreira
(editors)
All the content presented in texts are solely the responsibility of the authors. The ideas presented do not necessarily represent the opinion of the editors.
2.7. “Fallen fallen is Babylon”. Polish punk rock scene in the 1980s ____________ 155
Piotr Zanko

PART 3 | MUSIC SCENES, POLITICS AND IDEOLOGY: SOCIAL-HISTORICAL MEMORIES AND
CONTEMPORARY PRACTICES ____________________________________________ 163

3.1. Independence or death: alternative music in the Brazilian 80’s _______________ 165
Tereza Virginia de Almeida

3.2. Underground politics: “I am sure they know we are not the devil’s son and that metal is against corruption” – heavy metal as (sub-) cultural expressions in authoritarian regimes ________________________________ ________________________________ 173
André Epp

3.3. Before the DIY: Jovem Guarda and youth culture in Brazil (65-68) ____________ 183
Marcelo Garson

3.4. Rock in Portugal: effects of the rock music in the Portuguese youth (1960 vs. 2014) 197
Ana Martins

3.5. "The Garage were I was born": Coimbra’s musical scene in the 1990’s ____________ 209
Pedro Emanuel Almeida Martins

3.6. Underground music in America’s heartland: “Rising Appalachia” and traditional folk/pop as social protest ________________________________ __________________ 217
Michael Saffle
Jordan Laney

3.7. The influence of punk in the social movements ________________________________ 227
Liljana Siljanovska
Vlera Ejupi

PART 4 | CONTEMPORARY UNDERGROUND CULTURES’ AESTHETICS: BETWEEN THE
DIGITAL, THE RETRO AND THE NOSTALGIA ________________________________ 231

4.1. uTubo – development and application of an alternative digital musical instrument __ 233
Tiago Ângelo
Óscar Rodrigues
Nuno Peixoto de Pinho
José Alberto Gomes

4.2. One is the loneliest number: “one-man bands” and doing-it-yourselfs versus doing-it-alone ________________________________ 249
Matt Brennan

4.3. “We like raves, but...” Shituationism as a way out of the dilemma of hedonism __261
Benjamin Conti
Lukas Fakegruber

4.4. A survey on graphic communication and publishing practices in the Portuguese independent music scene _________________________________________________ 265
Manuel Oliveira Garcia
João Cordeiro

4.5. The subcultural scene economy of the Berlin techno scene ____________________________ 277
Jan-Michael Kühn
4.6. “Pimp your Pipes!” Knowledge, networks and DIY practices in the revival(s) of bagpipes
Thomas Kühn

4.7. Jazz scenes and networks in Europe: repackaging independent jazz – new strategies for emerging markets
Haftor Medbøe

4.8. Deka - skate, illustration and the other side of the skateboard
Jorge Brandão Pereira
Diogo Valente
Diogo Soares
Paula Tavares

4.9. Social media is the new punk. User experience, social music and diy culture
Giovanni Prattichizzo

PART 5 | MUSICAL PRODUCTION, MEDIATION, CONSUMPTION AND FRUITION IN THE CONTEMPORANEITY

5.1. Musicality, culture and sociology of artistic-musical production of Ceará Blues
Carlos Rubens Garcia Alves
Kadma Marques Rodrigues

5.2. Dodging the middleman: Insights on disintermediation in the independent music sector
Francisco Bernardo

5.3. Materialities of the new: processes of destruction and construction in the work of Einstürzende Neubauten
Sandra Bettencourt

5.4. Isolation: towards the politics of new music: reflections on the momentum of new music in Portuguese cultural policy
Gil Fesch

5.5. “This is it!” : peak music experiences in the Brisbane indie music scene
Ben Green

5.6. Experimental music and the reprogramming of apparatuses
José Guilherme Allen Lima

5.7. Music as as a way of living: the case of Sonoscopia
Ana Luísa Veloso
Maria José Araújo

PART 6 | UNDERGROUND MUSIC SCENES

6.1. Above and below ground
Will Straw

6.2. Why it makes sense to speak of emancipation: an overview of futureplaces as a current space for Punk to rise and reinvent
Heitor Alvelos
Anselmo Canha
Fátima São Simão
6.3. ‘Ironbound’? A sociospatial perspective on network diachrony in the Portuguese metal subfield 419
André Aleixo

6.4. Ideology and identity in underground circuits 453
Bernardo Álvares

6.5. Grito Rock Festival: from do it yourself to do it together 463
Daniel Domingues Barbosa
Luiza Bittencourt

6.6. Developing tourism locally through a heavy metal music festival: an attempt to maximize resources and tourist services in Viana do Castelo, Portugal 473
Jorge Coelho

6.7. The disturbing voice of the lower-class: from eighteenth century “Gracioso” to punk rock 483
Isabel Pinto

6.8. Counterculture in the periphery of capitalism: Raul Seixas and the Brazilian underground scene in the early 1970s 495
Lucas Marcelo Tomaz de Souza

6.9. Sing it yourself! Uses and representations of the English language in French popular and underground music 509
Michael Spanu

PART 7 | LOCAL SCENES, COMMUNITIES, IDENTITIES AND URBAN CULTURES 521
7.1. Creative social innovation - Human Being - Hip Hop for a Cause 523
João Paulo Ferreira

7.2. The multiple legitimacies of Tentacle Tribe, a dance company 535
Mary Fogarty
Jonathan Osborn
Deanne Kearney

7.3. Local scenes, conditions of music making and neoliberal city management - a case study of Hamburg, Germany 547
Robin Kuchar

7.4. Space and place in urban culture 559
Hélder Maia
Catarina Braga Araújo

7.5. The “L” train in New York City: mediating the Brooklyn music scene(s) 565
Jonathan Rouleau

7.6. “But who doesn’t know The Beatles anyway?” Young fans of New Beatlemania today 569
Nuéné Nikoghosyan
6.2. Why it makes sense to speak of emancipation: an overview of futureplaces as a current space for Punk to rise and reinvent

Heitor Alvelos¹
Anselmo Canha²
Fátima São Simão³

¹ PhD (Royal College of Art), University of Porto, Portugal.
² MA (University of Porto). University of Porto, Portugal.
³ MA (City University London). University of Porto, Portugal.
We begin by positing a perplexity in this day and age: this perplexity is media-driven, and it concerns us. New media seem busy carving a paradox, one where the tacit and proclaimed promise of endless (and endlessly renewable) self-expression betrays itself in a cathedral of algorithmic determinism, a foreboding banality - while maintaining that yes, the Sky is the limit as far as one’s existential promise is concerned. The allure of connectivity to the point of a saturated, hallucinatory frenzy knows no nemesis, no redemption: it hovers hostile, half-baked, as pseudo-ontological evidence, seductive bullying. Instant segments of hilarious stimulation, endorphins rather than cognition. Add the ever-expanding spiral of statistical complexity, the allure of “all is in order” in face of the sore evidence that all is not. This vertigo on steroids, this bored expectation to be blown away. This conviviality of opposites, this serene paradox, a paradox that, by virtue of overwhelming presence, no longer formulates itself as a driving existential conundrum: 2014, no less.

No wonder a benevolent anger emerges. The overwhelming, desolate hunch that somewhere, somehow, something went the wrong way... Not so much the acrobatic mantra of economic hubris, as the realisation that cultural emancipation, voided of ideological investment, has become an infantile hall of mirrors entertaining themselves and their opposite. The post-WW2 birth of the concept of Youth, and its vast landscape of possibilities: youth cultures, subcultures, counter-cultures, the will to dream harder, the ability to play harder, transgress, cultivate, reinvent from scratch. The urgency of all this, the nobility, the gravitas: the paradox of our times is the evidence that all of these still apply, still live and thrive as narratives, as conscious possibilities - and yet no longer act, they no longer come to be, overtaken as they are by a magical paralysis... Shoved instead to the annals of museography, the cruel status of historical footnote, the peripheral role of a meme, a cute, disengaged cliché.

Let us therefore focus on the deterministic dominance of the template that governs the dynamics of the human fabric. We speak of technological structure, and how it sets up camp in relationships and routines, providing a discreet character. We speak of the unquestioned ruling ethical assumption of how labour is processed, how survival is preserved, how elevation is treasured. We speak of how this template merges, in its birth, with the illuminist roots of science, driving (for the time being) the global scope of civilization. Yet we also speak of reason as an apparently infallible tool - when in truth, it is equally as subjected to unilateral and perverse shaping of agendas. The underlying paradigm of most contemporary algorithmic-based exercises seems to be a deep mistrust in the human. The proclaimed imperative of “smart technology” somehow implies a “dumb user”, an individual unable to fulfill the premise, untrustworthy, incapable of self-transcendence if not for the gadget in question, automatism rather than pedagogy; the offer for help becomes an order of compliance.

Even if there was a viable absolute determination for our social, physical and biological complexity, and even if that determinism was applicable to human aspects that transcended circumstance, we would not escape the raw notion that reducing the field of possibilities to visible or probable ingredients corresponds to the reduction of the actual concepts of “possibility” and “future”. This reduction serves objectives - ironically, often undetermined themselves. And it has consequences. The shaping of rationales operates discreetly through daily routines, using formats and procedures to produce individual hideouts in the name of collective labour ethics, of survival and elevation. But what it effectively is, is the absence of risk, an exercise of maintenance, inductive ideological immutability disguised as liberation. It’s risk reduction through the algorithmic annihilation of the simple idea of possibility, the voiding of proposition, the aversion to prospection - all anchored in the structure of discrete, apparently inescapable elements, whose ultimate self-agenda is an evasion from the continuous and uncertain physicality of experience.

It’s the condition of the constrained word, of the Human held hostage to the reduction that emanates from his/her circumstance. Design as hypnotic seduction to this perversity, science as technical authority supporting alien and indeterminate ends, a radical disappearance of agendas. Creativity a looped reiteration of reduced expectation, a rarefaction of discovery. It is this loss of the sophisticated continuity of difference that generates nausea and demands action, demands a reconsideration of words and meanings.

The exhaustion of words is equally the exhaustion of the means of expression, of social and academic apparatus, of technological devices. The reduction of vocabularies stands in inverse proportion to the field of possibilities. The growing hermeticism of professional jargon echoes the volatile abbreviation of words in social media: LOL, AFAIK, IMHO - an unsurmountable generational gap of codification. Hermeticism further parallels the severe impoverishment of metaphor in informal conversation, as language becomes an end in itself, as the brightness of its modus operandi outshines its instrumental condition. The hypnosis of technology has overtaken the Life is was supposed to serve, and now issues command words: magic passwords, as evidenced while overlooking the media-driven constructions of possible Revolutions, just as much as in our small private daily exercises:

Egypt, Syria, Palestine, Youtube, Twitter, Facebook. Like, Comment, Share. Like, Comment, Share. Visceral manifestations, diluted in their own media lexicon. Simultaneous decapitation and embrace, in the very same flat surface. Share. Socio-cultural circumstance sterilised in a forest of papers. Submit. Buildings that contain the city. Selfie. Youth besides the body, youth besides time. Perpetuations of the idea of rebellion or revolution, but not their hard, impactful experience. "Share" as a pure process of statistical amplification, yet perversely willing to maintain an apparent narrative of generosity at all costs. A fatal semblance of Life, an absence of the Death that generates Life. Life. Like.
Futureplaces, incubation of emancipations

Futureplaces is one of the key initiatives of the UTAustin-Portugal program in digital media, and it remains an event deeply rooted in the cultural landscape of Porto. Work began very intuitively in late 2007, around the thought that rather than organizing a digital media festival according to expectations, it would be best to propose an unequivocal focus on socio-cultural impact. This was a means of territorial differentiation, but was also an acknowledgment of the purpose of a festival within an advanced R&D program joining universities, partners and entrepreneurs.

What we did not expect was the magnitude of possibilities to connect with the socio-cultural fabric, beyond the institutional framework. Social promiscuity, we learned to call it: politicians, musicians, homeless citizens, hackers, universities, graffiti writers, NGOs, tech-heads, and disabled citizens. Researchers, DJs, human rights groups, artists, museums, sexual minorities, other festivals, pirates, schools, street musicians, start-up companies, bloggers, activists, security guards, designers and cooks. Mayors, headhunters, academics, media labels, car tuning communities, radio producers, anarchists, seamstresses, entrepreneurs, immigrants, tourists, and people who just happened to pass by. All of the above were and are part of this experiment, and the unifying thread is the simple evidence that these endless crossroads raise the standard of dignity for all.

The experience of futureplaces is an intuitive antidote, a counterpoint, consciously returning to direct contact with ambivalence and the amplitude of Life. It is shock therapy for nausea and a training ground for possible emergency exits. It configures itself as a long-term laboratorial condition, of deliberately undefined contours: where ingredients and outputs burst as capacitation to autonomous navigation in uncertainty, as a deepening and a renewal of its own experimental factors that may improve this training, and as a focus of small, contaminating particles beyond the temporal and functional circumscription of the lab.

At futureplaces, the rigour and accuracy that are convened are of an existential and visceral nature, and it is from there that they revert to creative activity, keeping technical dexterity in its effective, instrumental place. Actions are critically directed towards circumstances and practices that make us, not with the goal of providing them with a judgment but establishing a fertile relationship with them - whether they translate as a rescuing of the residual or the apparently irrelevant, or deconstructing and provoking paradox to the point of caricature. Affectionate and heritage dimensions, epiphanies of various scales, revelations of the actual meaning of "sharing", sudden images that open up possibilities and readings of who we are. Unexpected (and improbable) convergence of talents, repertoires and sensibilities, bringing down walls that weren't there after all, accessibility of the creative act. An all-encompassing pedagogy of nothing to lose.

The actions of the Lab in its whole cultivate a complex multi-dimensionality that stems from a permanent questioning that drives the process - while feeding its own, ontological condition of mystery. A happy accident, or maybe not, that avoids premature labeling (tagging), that would signal a resignation at the core of its existence. Each practice often emerges without a clear or singular author, alchemic as it is in a dense negotiation between concept and praxis, provocation and proposition, intuition and structure, beyond system, taxonomy or category. And yet, an awareness breaks through in each participant: an awareness of their own possibilities for contribution, of the potentially tangible impact of their own intrinsic capacities. A brave and rigorous experience in the complex and indeterminate, towards effective, intimate change: incubation of emancipations.

Futureplaces is primarily a semantic territory where students and researchers challenge communities and usually end up being challenged themselves. Case at hand: October 2014. A group of non-guitarists - people with no prior experience in playing the guitar - get together one morning. They have never met before, and all know that, in 12 hours, they will be performing live, as guitar players, on a formal stage, in front of an audience. In one stroke, acoustic sensitivity is enhanced, compositional formats are shattered, the concept of a "concert" comes into question, and the notion of "experimental" itself is suddenly a question mark. Someone in the audience whispers: "I so wish I had something to join and make noise with". Meanwhile, a sound recital by 10 non-musicians proves: it is possible. And it is Punk.
And meanwhile, this same experiment is the understandable focus of greed from particular media sectors. A seductive and exotic concept, it will sort out a few seconds of broadcasting, and the channel will once again fulfill its role of connecting with citizens: even if the price to pay is the painful orchestration of the intimate rehearsal of these guitar anti-heroes. It must be shared, disseminated, all working towards a common good.

There are warning signs. Mass communication, talent-hunting agencies, brands in search of the exotic twist of the month. All have performed its own denial as agents of a system supposedly without a face, literally a system of appropriation, of transformation of the intimate, sacred and benevolent into alien hallucinatory entrenchment.

An essential part of the calibration of the futureplaces lab and experience is played outside and inside, between the cryptic and the communicable, between itself and its public image, between intuition and legibility. In other words, futureplaces is itself a territory of conflict. This is also Punk.

Since the early days of futureplaces, back in 2007, the word “future” has ceased its function as a projective space of affirmation, and now carries the ghost of imminent dissolution. We may of course extract the opposite from its operative surface: that the projection was hallucinatory, and dissolution may just be the gift of reinvention. Punk knew better than to hang around waiting for “no future” - it proclaimed the absence of a future as the actual lexical act of its own rebirth.

Johnny Rotten’s worn-out jacket, held together by safety pins so it would not fall apart, became an enduring fashion statement, an anti-fluffy if there ever was one. But what matters is not only the reference of the image as emanating urgently from circumstance: at futureplaces it is often a surface of rugged exoticism, an imperative that shelters and preserves the body and its manifestations, immune to appropriation: a cathartic space of sobriety, an emotional absence of fear. It is the necessary shelter for the intimate, rigorous work that demands to be made: a proposal of forgotten introspection giving way to intimate revolutions.

Even in this text, what is hereby described somehow breaks apart: somewhere along the way, and in face of the inevitability to share the research, a dense, seven-year-old-and-counting fabric of actions risks reduction, through the desire and the faith of its communicability. And this is Punk.
It is therefore the time to be viscerally aristocratic: not entitlement, but courage; not abandonment, but wisdom; not mannerism, but precision; not mindless connectivity, but generous self-exaction. Futureplaces aims at this throughout its seven-year stream, under the belief that new media are still extraordinary in their potential, yet only able to fulfill their promise in direct relation with our own visceral aristocracy. It seems we’re finally getting the hang of it: this is why the word “festival” was dropped - once the territory of collective epiphany, the word is now paved with self-indulgent, hyper-visible consumerism. And this is why we’d rather be a lab, even if to attempt the most celebratory rebuttal of expectations, and in the process, do exactly what needs to be done.

Further reading

Alvelos, Heitor, Karen Gustafson and Fátima São Simão. Between Riot and Rave: five years into a digital media festival. Essay based on futureplaces keynote by Heitor Alvelos, 2012. Available at futureplaces.org

